NO, VOODAH! MEN TALK

OKOYU'S TREASURE

by Paul Norton

Shouts of laughter and the tinny clangor of pebbles pelted at a wash basin awakened George Donner. He shoved himself half-erect in the hammock. The red-ball sun had passed its zenith and now burned down on the perspiring white man.

He cocked his head, listening. Then he bellowed: "Banyuta! You black son of Satan, come here!"

The racket stopped. A moment later a black monkey-face, topped by fuzzy wool-hair, peered around the corner of the shack. "You call, Bwana?"

"Come here!"

The native took a few fearful steps forward, and stopped, his eyes rolling, seeking escape.

"Here!" Donner barked, in a tone of voice, some men use to make a dog heel.

The native trembled, but advanced a few steps.

George Donner shot out a hand and grabbed Banyuta's skinny arm. Savagely, he twisted it behind the black's back. With his 'free hand he cuffed the wooly head from side to side.

Loud howls of anguish broke from the native's lips. "Aeee-O-ooooo wah!" he howled.

Tiring from his strenuous efforts, Donner quit the cuffing, and started berating the black who immediately stopped his wailing.

"You monkey-faced imp," Donner snarled.
"I ought to take your black hide off and toss it to the jackals!"

"Bwana ... no hit Banyuta."

Several natives crowded around the corner of the weather-beaten shack and watched the white man's strange behavior. To the fore stood a black a little taller, a little sturdier built than the others. His sharp, black eyes followed every move of the red-faced, perspiring white man.

When Donner saw the stranger, he turned his attention from the luckless Banyuta. "Who's this fellow?" He pointed a finger to indicate the large native.

"Him Okoyu." Banyuta pointed to the south, indicating the direction from which the new-comer had come.

"So that's what all the rumpus was about," George Donner muttered to himself. He never tolerated noise from the natives when he was sleeping. He knew they all feared him and the power of the automatic pistol that he always carried at his hip. And he hated them as much as they feared him. He hated all this hellish, burning South African country. He hated the smoldering sun, the unproductive mine—he almost hated himself.

"What does Okoyu want here?" he growled, scowling at the native.

Okoyu stood like an ebony statue. In his hands was the tin wash basin that had been making all the racket. Donner's eyes caught a flash of light coming from inside the basin. He jerked full erect, pale eyes gleaming.

"What's he got there—?" he asked. But he knew. He knew that only one thing made that brilliant shaft of light in the sun. Several small pebbles lay in the bottom of the tin pan. Diamonds. Rough diamonds.

He lumbered to his feet, a heavy blonde man; walked over and picked one of the stones from the pan.

The new black followed suit, aping Donner's actions like a monkey. He squinted seriously at the pebble. Then Okoyu grinned. The white man was pleased. He tossed his stone back into the basin. It rattled around with a gratifying noise, throwing off sparkling light as it tumbled about in the bowl.

"So, that's what was entertaining them," Donner mused. "They all are crazy about bright things."

"Where did you get these?" he demanded.
Okoyu grinned foolishly, but pointed to the okeyu griffined foolishly, but pointed to the south and held up three fingers. Three days to the South...

Immediately, George Donner's mind darted about, considering the possibilities. These fuzzy heads had no idea of the value of anything. If only he could get the black to lead him to the place where he'd picked up these shiny pebbles. He'd be rich! Rich! He could get out of this shell-hole of heat and cursed fever.

He went into the shack and began packing provisions for two men. Enough grub for seven days—that would allow for one day on the diamond grounds. Of course he wouldn't get all he wanted the first trip. He would go back again, alone.

Early the next morning he set out with the willing Okoyu leading the way. The native was curious about everything the white man did. He seemed puzzled, and amused, when on the second day out, Donner propped a small mirror on a rock by a stream and started shaving. The three-day growth of beard had begun to itch.

The black tried to peer into the mirror, too, and raised a great fuss when Donner drove him away with curses and blows. But Okoyu persisted. He wanted to look. So when he had finished shaving, just for the laugh, Donner held the mirror so Okoyu could see his own face.

The black looked astounded, then he shouted with laughter and tried to take the mirror in his own hands. Donner's patience and goodhumor ran short. He cuffed the native away. And they took up the trail again.

True to his word, on the third day Okoyu pointed to a hard-pan outcropping a short distance below a bluish clay hill. In the crevices of the hard rock outcropping were dozens of rough diamonds, washed there from the clay hill by flood rains.

Donner wanted to shout with joy, and scoop the precious stones out immediately. But he held himself back. How smart was Okoyu?

That was the question. Did the black realize the value of his find—now Donner's find—? If he went too wild over the bright pebbles, the native might realize they were of great value to white men...

With these thoughts in mind, Donner chose only the finest and largest stones he could find and stowed them safely away in his knapsack, carefully concealing his excitement. By the end of the day he had gathered over a hundred. It was enough — for this trip. Their food and water would be running low. They had to start back.

As they journeyed along the return trail, Donner kept a sharp eye to the terrain.

He had to return without a guide. Okoyu wouldn't be coming back, he wouldn't be going anywhere . . Okoyu would be dead. That was the only way to keep him from leading other white men to the diamond basin.

At the end of the first day's journey Donner began worrying over the diamonds in his pack.

He couldn't stay awake all night. What if Okoyu decided to rob him?

A cunning light crept into the white man's eyes. He couldn't afford to kill Okoyu—not yet. That would come later. When they were closer to home. But he could outwit that monkey-face—keep him from stealing the diamonds.

He set to work on the pack to rig a burglar alarm. He took the strap that buckled over the top of the sack and ran the leather through the trigger guard of his automatic. The slightest tug on the strap would set off the gun. Then he slid off the safety catch...

Satisfied that the gun-trap would go off if tampered with in the dark, he laid down to sleep.

He grinned to himself in the dark. That black imp would sure get a surprise if he tried to steal the diamonds now. The gun shot would awaken him before the thief could make his getaway.

With this happy thought bringing a peaceful frame of mind that led to dreams of himself as "Diamond King Donner" living in luxury the rest of life, the white man began to snore.

Okoyu pretended to be asleep, but one bright eye was half open, watching the Bwana. He didn't understand what all the fuss over the pack had been about. All he waited for was the deep regular snores to tell him that theman-with-the-treasure-in-a-bag was soundly asleep.

Silent as a shadow, Okoyu slipped from his sleeping place and edged toward the white man's pack. A great desire to possess its treasure burned in his breast. He reached out a hand and felt of the pack, rolling it gently around. Suddenly, it spouted flame and thunder. The bullet whipped a breeze between Okoyu's legs as the .45 barked spitefully.

George Donner jerked in his blankets, let out a surprised howl and grabbed his chest. A searing pain swept through his lungs. He'd been shot by his own gun-trap!

He struggled to rise, fell back. The strength oozed out of him. He was helpless to stop the thieving black!

Okoyu, panicky now, rummaged quickly through the opened pack, searching for the treasure. His hand closed. With a shout of joy he grasped it tightly and galloped across the clearing, headed for his home village. At every leap he made, the moonlight threw shafts of pale light from the coveted treasure—the little mirror in Okoyu's hand.
